PREFACE.

ALMOST any other painter would need more of an introduction to the American public than William M. Chase. His pictures, his pupils, his active participation in every good work touching the development of native art, and the famous studio in Tenth Street, have made him well known, not only in New York but throughout the country, to everybody in any way interested in art and artists, and his reputation as a painter extends to Paris, London, and the other art centres of Europe. Ever since 1878, when he came to New York, he has been in the front rank of the valiant band of workers who have spread the fame of American painting and made its merit known to many who, before their advent knew it as little more than a name. Now after eighteen years of service with a long list of honors to his credit, and a generous meed of material success, he announces his intention of breaking camp and seeking a rest in a sojourn abroad. It is not a period of idle voyaging that he proposes for himself, but a rest to be gained by change of scene and change of work. With a company of pupils he will go to the great gallery at Madrid, and afterward return to continue his career among us with a new studio and home in that picturesque quarter of our city called Stuyvesant Square.

So the big studio in Tenth Street is dismantled ; the painter's own pictures and those he has gathered together, the hangings and furniture, the curiosities and objects of art, are ticketed and catalogued, and the connoisseur and the collector are bidden to come and take what they want. Let us hope that they will bring to their inspection some part of the sort of appreciation that has guided the artist himself in the acquirement of his collections; something of the spirit that prompted him to secure for his own delectation the things that his eyes lighted upon and recognized as good, whenever and wherever he found them.

Mr. Chase went to Europe in 1872, and became a pupil of Piloty in the Royal Academy of Munich. He remained in Munich, with the exception of a year spent in Venice, until 1878, when he came to New York. Since then he has spent seven summers abroad. Sometimes he studied and copied the masterpieces of Velasquez in Madrid, at other times those of Franz Hals and other great Dutchmen in Haarlem and the Hague. But each year he went to Paris and took note of what his contemporaries were doing, and the trend of the "movements" in the art of to-day as shown in the great cosmopolitan exhibitions at the Salon and the Champ de Mars. A "tonist" in his earlier days, with a strong bent for the sober color schemes of the then flourishing Munich school, his work gradually showed the influence of the more progressive painters of France. The plein air discoveries of Bastien, the impressionism of Monet and Manet, the realistic portraiture of Bonnat, the synthetic compositions of Puvis de Chavannes, and the symphonious transcriptions of Whistler, were all studied, and from all he drew instruction and profit; but his individuality constantly asserted itself in his work, and his pictures have always been marked by a strong personal note. While he has painted many portraits, and his work in that field is of the best that American art has to show, out-of-door and landscape subjects have appealed to him with persistent force. His sense of the picturesque in this direction first found expression in the charming canvasses painted in Central Park, and in Prospect Park in Brooklyn. In these pictures the note of locality was given with sincerity and truth, and the technical processes revealed an aptitude and brilliancy not foreshadowed in his other work. Though the method was somewhat new, the personal quality retained its strong influence, and they are among the best things he has produced. For the last four years he has spent his summers on Long Island, where he has directed the work of a host of pupils at the Shinnecock Summer School of Art. Here his landscape work has greatly developed, and each autumn he has brought back, for the exhibitions at the Society of American Artists and the National Academy, a goodly lot of pictures that have constantly added to his reputation and given fresh proofs of his versatility. Some such successes as "Flying Clouds" and "The Old Road to the Sea" in the present exhibition will show how comprehensive is the painter's grasp of facts, how trustworthy is his generalization, and how sympathetic is his feeling for nature. Perhaps more than all else in such a rapid survey as this, where points of excellence cannot be dwelt upon in detail, the fine quality of the skies should be mentioned, and the masterly way in which they envelope the landscape should be noted. They cover it on high like a canopy, and recede behind it, not like a curtain hung up as a background, but as a part of the aërial perspective, seen as we see it from our mundane point of view, and yet as so few painters have learned to represent it, through lack of reasoning power and cultivated observation.

In such pictures as "Ready for the Walk" and "A Lady in White" we shall have an opportunity to judge of Mr. Chase's virtuosity as a painter of the figure; in various interiors and still-life compositions we shall see with what straightforwardness he conceives his subject and with what simplicity and directness he interprets it. Virile drawing and veracious and alluring color mark his performances, and his catholicity of taste is attested by the variety of the motifs that have appealed to him.

The works from the painter's own hand, and those, old and new, by others that form his collection, count up to about two hundred numbers. Such copies as those of the "Æsop" and "Menippus" and "The Spinners" by Velasquez, and the "Committee Women" by Franz Hals, have an even greater value in this country, where we are so far removed from the great European galleries, than belongs to them through their intrinsic merit. When Mr. Chase was copying the "Committee Women" in Haarlem, M. Bonnat, than whom there is no greater lover of the Dutch masters and no better judge of their qualities, came into the gallery and stopped to look at the work of the American painter. He told him that it was the best copy he had ever seen made of the picture, and asked him if he had seen those by Vollon in the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris. Paris is but a short journey from Holland, but the French Government has thought it well worth while to buy copies of masterpieces there, as well as in Italy and Spain, made by the most competent French painters, and has placed them where students and the public may see them and learn from them. M. Bonnat's own admirable copy of "The Lesson in Anatomy" by Rembrandt are among those thus permanently placed in the French capital, and the example might well be followed here.

Among the old masters belonging to Mr. Chase none, perhaps, is more interesting than the portrait group by de Keyser. Dr. Bode, the famous authority, says it is one of the best of this painter's works. An unknown head, purchased as a Van Dyke, but which Mr. Chase's expert judgment attributes, with more than possible correctness, to Philip de Champagne, and a fine head that bears many marks of its having come from the hand of Rubens, are other important works. A delightful water-color by Fortuny, a still-life by Vollon, and a characteristic picture, in the impressionist vein, by Mlle. Berthe Morizot, "The Toilette," show that Mr. Chase's appreciation of the work of the moderns is unprejudiced and broad.

There are too many things in the other collections to mention even the different classifications. An idea of their extent may be had from the fact that there are thirty-seven Russian samovars and over six hundred antique finger-rings. Spanish and Italian tapestries, a fine lot of Persian jars and plaques that might go en bloc to one of our museums, Italian, Dutch, and German cabinets, embroidered stuffs, and brass and iron work, make a most attractive display. Quite apart from the interest given to the collections by their being sold, is the interest in the objects themselves. Each one has been scrutinized by an artist before being given a place in his intimate surroundings, and each one has a particular value by its genuineness and rarity.

SECOND AFTERNOON'S SALE.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8th, BEGINNING PROMPTLY AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.

JAVANESE CURIOS, ETC.

*.* The Lots 312 to 324 represent different figures and paraphernalia formerly used in theatrical performances. These figures of cut leather or paper were manipulated from behind transparent screens, so that these shadows would be reflected thereon, the talking being done by a man called "Dalang." Later on, the screen was discarded and marionettes were substituted. This mode of theatrical amusement is still adopted by the poorer classes of Javanese.

MR. CHASE'S COLLECTION OF RINGS.

From Harper's Bazar.

MR. WILLIAM M. CHASE, the distinguished artist, has been a collector of miscellanies for a great many years, and the things he has gathered in his studio in West Tenth Street, New York, have long been noted for their picturesqueness, and the other qualities which delight those whose purpose it is in life to create the beautiful. He has swords and pistols, spears and daggers, and almost every conceivable weapon of offence and defence ; his walls are hung with splendid tapestries, and over these are paintings that are beautiful or curious or rare. Few men in this country have been so given up to the delights of collecting, but, in the main, Mr. Chase has bought that which pleased him, without regard to completeness in any one branch. There are one or two exceptions to this general habit, however, for he has what is surely the most complete and the most interesting collection of antique finger-rings to be found in this country, and possibly the most interesting private collection of the kind in the world. Mr. Chase will presently give up his studio in Tenth Street, and in the second week in January his collections will be sold at the rooms of the American Art Association. It seems a pity that this collection of rings could not be purchased as a whole and placed in one of the public museums. It is likely, however, that it will be broken up, and the various specimens go to enrich other collections in this country and Europe.

Finger-rings have been worn from very remote ages, though the custom seems to have been more general in Egypt than in any other part of the ancient world. At any rate, we know more of the ring-wearing habits of the ancient Egyptians, for rings are found even on the hands of mummies. In early times rings were not merely ornaments, but were used to seal letters and give authenticity to commands at a time when reading and writing were not universal. The earliest rings were of pure gold, simple in design and massive in construction, and they usually bore the name and titles of the owner in hieroglyphic characters. The poorer classes wore rings of cheaper metal, and even of glass and pottery. The Assyrians and Babylonians wore bracelets instead of rings. The signet on these was on a hard stone, perforated from end to end, and bound to the wrist by a cord. The Etruscans, however, were great ring-wearers, and the scarabæus was a favorite kind of setting. There is a fine sample of the Etruscan scarabæus ring in Mr. Chase's collection. The scarab is decorated with Egyptian hieroglyphics on back and belly, and it swings on a pivot—the usual method of setting.

The wearing of rings was probably introduced into Greece from Asia, and from Greece into Italy. In Athens rings were set with beautiful engraved gems, and a real Athenian dandy would cover the fingers of both of his hands with these costly ornaments. The simple Spartans did not like the custom, and a sumptuary law was passed forbidding the wearing of rings made of more valuable substances than iron. Some ancient types of iron rings are highly prized by collectors on account of their rarity; having no intrinsic value, they have not been kept as carefully, until recently, as rings of gold and silver and those embellished with jewels. The Romans, when they first took to wearing rings, imitated the simplicity of the Spartans, and for a long time only iron rings were worn. High officers of state, when performing some public duty, wore gold rings, but the custom spread, and the gold ring was soon worn by all persons of consequence. The Romans also wore key-rings—rings made of bronze, with an actual and serviceable key as the "bezel." These keys unlocked the treasure-chests, and a master who confided this ring to friend, servant, or slave was considered to have in that person complete and entire trust.

In the Christian era the most historical of rings are those that have been worn by the Popes and the other dignitaries of the Roman Church. We often hear of papal rings, and generally it is understood that such a ring has been worn by a Pope; but papal is the name given to the rings worn by the Cardinals, and given to each by the Pope when invested with office. Each Pope has what is called the "Fisherman's Ring," a ring that descends from one Pope to another, and this is used to seal minor decrees and briefs. Then each pontiff on state occasions wears an exquisitely fine cameo, cut in blood-stone, of the head of our Saviour. This is known to be more than three hundred years old. This also descends from one Pope to another. Besides these the Pope has another ring, which is his own, and which usually bears some device or inscription of his own choosing and of individual significance. A bishop in the Roman Church is invested with a ring, and this was in the old time buried with him. Mr. Chase has a splendid episcopal ring of the thirteenth century, and of Italian workmanship. It is of gold, with a sapphire set without being cut in facets, or technically encabochon.

Rings have long been used in betrothal and marriage ceremonies. The first of this kind known were "gemel," or "ginmel," rings—that is, twin rings. They could be worn doubly or singly, and when used as a betrothal pledge each person to the engagement wore one of the hoops. Such rings are by no means obsolete to-day. The marriage ring used by Martin Luther when he was wed to the emancipated nun Catherine von Bora, was a gemel-ring, but the hoops could not be separated, as one passed through the other. Martin Luther's betrothal ring is of curious fashion, and is still preserved as a national relic of great interest. Mr. Chase has a replica of this ring, which is composed of an intricate device of gold-work set with a ruby—the emblem of exalted love. The gold devices represent all the symbols of the "Passion." In the centre is the crucified Saviour; on one side, the spear with which the side was pierced, and the rod of reeds of the flagellation. On the other side is the leaf of hyssop. Beneath are the dice with which the soldiers cast lots for the garment without seam, and below are the three nails. At the back may be distinguished the inside of the ladder and other symbols connected with the last act of the atonement. On the inside of the ring are inscribed the names of the betrothed pair, and the date of the wedding-day in German: "der 13 Junij 1525." This ring was no doubt designed by the celebrated painter and goldsmith Lucas Cranach, and probably wrought with his own hand.

Besides signet-rings, betrothal, marriage, and ecclesiastical rings, there are others of great variety and interest—poison and charm rings, for instance. The poison-ring had a needle constructed like a serpent's tooth within the bezel of the ring, and was operated by a concealed spring. The poisoner would scratch the hand of his victim while shaking hands. These rings were actually used in Italy in the Middle Ages, and they are said not to be entirely obsolete in India to-day.

Mr. Chase has in his collection more than six hundred specimens, which represent with much fidelity the ring-wearing fashions and customs from early Egyptian dynasties to last year in Japan. The Japanese, by-the-way, have only worn rings within this century. The hoops of Japanese rings are broken, so each ring will fit any finger.
